Miss Weigensberg wore a pale blue nylon blouse, with a Peter Pan collar, and full, puffed sleeves; with a black taffeta skirt. There was a fruit centrepiece on the table.

The first saplings were planted in three memorial forests near Jerusalem recently, in the names of Leopold Markus, Daniel Brick, and Jacques Zohn. Non-Jewish friends sent Swedish earth to be mingled with the earth of Israel as a symbol of undying friendship between the two countries. The forests were planted in tribute to the invaluable assistance rendered by the three Swedish Jews to Israel.

The Shadchan's Courtship

BY M. P. ZANGWILL HORN

Mannie Greenbaum had been successful in everything except in getting his family off his hands. Behind the façade of a prosperous antique business he carried on the trade of a flourishing marriage broker. He was a huge, chuckling man of sixty with a virile grey beard and a shiny bald patch. He had been known not always to act with the highest diplomacy, but got away with most lapses because he was accepted in Anglo-Jewry as 'a character', and his beaming good looks and twinkling good nature covered a multitude of mistakes, some of which seemed at the time unpardonable. Once, when a likely lass had been introduced to a likely lad and they had conversed easily and naturally all through dinner, Mannie had kindled a bright pink flame of embarrassment that ran up to their ears by leaning over the young man's shoulder and enquiring in a confidential stage whisper: "Well, will it work?"

He did the most outrageous things sometimes. But he also did so well that it was surely the height of irony that so far he had not succeeded in marrying off a single one of his six lovely daughters, among whom were one set of twins, and as for his one son, that mild youth was already so hen-pecked that it did not seem that he would ever have the spirit to propose to a girl. In a Jewish family consisting largely of women, the only son is usually treated like a prince in Israel, but not so poor Phil Greenbaum. The girls took after their exuberant father and Phil after his quiet mother. Dominated by his father and trampled on by his sisters, he was a pleasant but shadowy figure amid so much colourful femininity.

Every one of the sisters had oney in her own name and would well-dowered in addition. Zipporah, the eldest, handsomest and most dominating, had the most money, and was said to have a broken heart as well, though she showed little signs of it. The only young man she had ever fancied she had summarily dismissed because she suspected him of being after her money. The five younger sisters turned up their pretty noses at all the photographs of possible bridegrooms that their father brought them. And Mannie Greenbaum didn't help matters on; he was incredibly obtuse at times. Once, when a nice boy wanted to take one of the twins for a walk along the front of the prosperous seaside town where they lived, Mannie, beaming broadly, said: "Ve vill all go for a walk!"

His wife had been as shadowy a figure as her only son. After producing one boy, she tried unsuccessfully to repeat the achievement so many times that finally she retired into a gentle decline and bequeathed her place in the household to Zipporah, who filled it with gusto, being skilled in all domestic arts at an early age. So imperious was Zippie that by 1890, when she was twenty-five, Mannie seriously thought of taking the household authority out of her autocratic hands and handing it over to a stepmother with a personality at least as strong.

There was only one woman he knew who would meet his requirements, and she was Nellie Vronsky, widow of a distinguished rabbi, with two marriageable daughters of her own but also three distinguished and eligible sons. The addition of three more females to his family was a somewhat frightening idea, but he felt that it would suit his dignity better to be ordered about by a woman of his own generation than by a girl too big for her boots. After all, even if it didn't come off, he might do himself and some of his daughters a bit of good with Nellie's three fine sons.

He had wanted to marry Nellie thirty-five years ago, when she was the vivid and vivacious Nellie Rosenthal, but she had found him too Philistine and materialistic for her fastidious taste, although she couldn't help liking the crude, comical fellow. A life-long family friendship had testified to that liking and he had had the highest respect for her husband. Now he would try his luck with Nellie once more! She has always been tempestuous and fascinating, a terror at times; she amused him and kept him on his toes. He had thought sometimes that being a rabbi's wife must have cramped her style considerably. An intelligent, virtuous woman, far better educated than Mannie, steady and dutiful, but how she went up in flame at times, just to vary the monotony of a hard-working Jewish housewife's life. Mannie once said of her ruminatively: "She is like a cow vot gives good milk and then kicks the pail over!" Very different from his own wife, who had perhaps been bovine but had certainly lacked the kick.

The Greenbaum estate, just outside the seaside town, had its own dairy-farm and orchards, and Zippie and her sisters made fine dairy-maids and milk-maids when the spirit moved them. They were a pretty sight in the rich meadows. Mannie liked to retire down there with his family as often as he could, for in a place with big grounds the young people were a little less exhausting. So much feminine vitality, colour and perfume! It was better in the open air, said Mannie. And he persuaded his old friend Nellie Vronsky to come down for a week in late summer with her two daughters; her sons were elusive, on their own business bent. They had their opinions as to old Greenbaum and his overpowering daughters, though nobody could deny the girls' beauty and goodness of heart. The trouble was that there were so many of them.

Nellie arrived, regal and spirited as Zipporah, with her daughters in her train like maids in waiting. Zippie was tall and golden and Nellie was a little dark woman; it used to be said that she had the proportions of the Venus de Medici. She had had a warm, Italian type and at fifty-six was still flashing, her dark eyes lustrous beneath her high crest of bright grey hair, her figure slim and upright. When indignant or otherwise on her dignity, she drew herself up to her full five feet three inches and appeared to tower. She had never allowed herself to appear impressed by Mannie's breadth and height; her own husband had been frail, with a scholar's stoop that made him look short. She was ever an impressive figure. Beneath her full imperious glance her docile daughters drooped, charmingly doe-eyed and modest, like their reverend father.

Surprisingly, Zipporah and Nellie got on famously, acknowledging and respecting each other's quality, even though they spent several days under the same roof. Nellie was not slow to perceive that there was excellent daughter-in-law material here, though she would hardly admit it, even to herself. Zippie was well-trained in old-fashioned Jewish hospitality, and the queenly Nellie was treated like a queen and her demure daughters like princesses.

The unassuming Phil Greenbaum appeared genuinely attracted to the elder girl, who had the still grace of carving in ivory and ebony, but although Nellie Vronsky ought to have been prepared for such a thing she was indignant.

"He shan't have her!" she stormed to her younger daughter. "A Greenbaum isn't good enough for a Vronsky."

"But Mama, if their house is good enough for us to stay in—"

"Hold your tongue!"

Mannie had always been a little afraid of Nellie, but his admiration was greater than his fear, so he plucked up the courage to propose to her again after thirty-five years.

Quizzical and, for the moment, poker-faced, Nellie looked him straight in the eye. "My dear man, if I didn't want you when I was young, why should I want you when I'm old?"

"Na, Nellie, ain't I got more to offer you now?"

"I've always done very well without it, Mannie. Money and misery—they often go together."

"More often misery and no money, Nellie. Vy should you turn up your nose at a nice fat bank balance? Or is it a nice fat man that don't suit your ladyship?"

"Yes, you're more fat than you used to have, and less hair. And even more chutpah. I couldn't put up with you. You're not what I've been used to, Mannie Greenbaum."

"But a change is good for everyone," Mannie observed, and Nellie snorted.

There was more distinction, she felt, in being the widow of Solomon Vronsky, whose name would endure in Israel, and in living in a dignified and comfortable way in a medium-sized house in Hampstead than in becoming the second wife of that vulgar but well-meaning chacham Mannie Greenbaum—junk-dealer, pawn-broker and shadchan. Although his town house and his country house were very nice, even if too full of junk, and he had lovely fruit trees and poultry galore. But marriage. Pfu! She wouldn't hear of it.

"What do you want with marriage at your age, Mannie?"

"Nu! I have seven mudderless kinder," said Mannie pathetically. "I want a mudder for my daughters and my boy. Six gels and no mudder to turn to—"

"Zipporah doesn't do so badly."

"But it's hard on poor Zippie. She don't get married."

"That girl of yours won't get married in a hurry. She's so much of a ballabasta now that she'd frighten almost any man off. It would take my Izzie to deal with her—she takes after me."

"It's a pity your Izzie don't come down and see vat a fine cook my Zippie is. If he'd be a match for her, she'd be a fine match for him."

"My Izzie doesn't have to come down here to find a wife. Do you think I want my family mixed up with your match-making business? I tell you, you're ruining all your girls' chances by making them go about like a flock of sheep. You ought to know better. And you call yourself a shadchan. Any boy would take fright when he saw your family, Mannie."

"Well, I think it's a pity, a very great pity you won't take pity on my family, Nellie. Maybe you'd make a better match-maker than me. My gels are so pig-headed. They want that a young man shall come along and fall in love mit them. Did you ever hear such nonsense?"

"Haven't I enough family of my own? Two unmarried daughters are quite enough, thank you. What do I want with six more? Why, if I accepted you we'd have twelve children in all, between us. Du lieber Gott! Haven't I got enough troubles already?"

"You wouldn't have no more troubles if you married me, my dear."

"That's a matter of opinion." She was clearly ruffled, scarcely honoured by the compliment he had paid her, and her masterful nose and chin had an aggressive tilt for the rest of the day; she refused to stay longer and bade her daughters pack. How stricken everyone looked, particularly her ivory-and-ebony daughter and young Phil Greenbaum!

Mannie was mortified; he had hoped for a nice little celebration dinner in time for Rosh Hashanah, with four of his finest cockerels roasted as only Zipporah could roast them, and his finest plums and apples in one of Zipporah's finest pies. But to show that there was no ill feeling, he insisted on making a present of two of the cockerels to Nellie to take home with her alive and kicking, and ordered a grand hamper to be packed for her full of his own dairy produce, his prize red apples and a few jars of his golden honey, and the cockerels to be accommodated in another hamper. It was an easy, good-humoured gesture and Nellie accepted it with a better grace than that with which she had refused Mannie.

When Nellie arose on the day of her departure, her elder daughter had already departed, and so had young Phil Greenbaum, and the notes they had left behind left no mystery of their intentions; the only mystery was where they had gone to carry out those intentions. Nellie went up in smoke and flame.

"You knew all about it," she stormed at Mannie. "This is your doing, you scheming old devil! You've been encouraging them behind my back! I won't have it! I won't have it! They must be brought back."

"No, Nellie, don't be such a hard voman. Ain't you got no romance in your heart? They love each other — vy shouldn't they have each other? I knew nothing about it, nothing, I tell you."

Nellie towered like Vesuvius, still flaming. "Why should they sneak off like thieves in the night?"

Mannie shrugged his huge shoulders and spread his huge hands deprecatingly. "Well, Nellie, after all, they know what you are."

"And what am I?" erupted the volcano. "Am I an ogress, to eat my children?"

"Nellie, my dear, he's a good boy and she's a good girl. I'll give them a fine house and furniture. I'll make Phil a partner in the business. You won't have nothing to regret, Nellie. Vy be such a schnob? After all, your fader and my fader both came out of the same ghetto. Vy should my son not be good enough for your daughter?"

Nellie and her girls were to have caught the London train after a pleasant and leisurely lunch, but now Nellie, on fire with outraged indignation, was determined to catch the first train back. Not for the world would she have admitted the spreading of the satisfied maternal glow from the core of her heart. It was not a bad shidduch for a quiet girl who could not be richly dowered, and she knew it. Her daughter and Phil were well matched. The girl had done very well for herself. But she would not remain under Mannie's roof a minute longer than necessary, although, as Mannie pointed out, no useful purpose could be served by returning to town so soon. When she suspected that Zipporah and Mannie and the girls were trying to detain her, she flew into another rage and put on her bonnet decisively.

"If the pony and trap aren't ready we can walk to the station."

"No, Nellie, not so fast, my dear. I'll send for the trap at once. Vy should you walk? Wait a minute, Nellie. Don't be so hasty. Vat have I done, after all? Vy not stay to lunch?"

Nellie towered. "Stay to lunch, when God knows what's happening to my girl with that scapegrace son of yours? It would choke me. Not another mouthful do I eat in your house."

"No, Phil's a good boy, Nellie. She won't come to no harm. How long does it take to get a special licence? And I tell you, you don't know where they've gone, so vat good can you do by running up to London? Now, now, Nellie, don't get so worked up. Try to see reason, my dear."

But neither he, nor Zipporah, nor her five sisters, nor her younger daughter, who had been most tremendously thrilled at the elopement, could induce in Nellie a calmer frame of mind. Zipporah kissed the guests goodbye and whispered to Nellie's flustering daughter "Don't argue with your mother, dear, give her best. She'll come round. And perhaps I'll see you again soon, for only yesterday she was saying that I must come and stay with you. It'll all be all right, you'll see."

"Oh, Zippie, it's all so bewildering. Just fancy, a real elopement, like something out of a novel."

"I wouldn't have thought Phil had it in him. Still waters run deep." Good old Phil. Goodbye, dear. Give my love to the boys."

Nellie arrived at the station in such good time for her train that she was just in time to catch the one before. She sailed down the platform with her daughter hurrying in her wake and Mannie bringing up the rear puffing and blowing beneath the burden of the hamper containing the protesting cockerels; he had been too flustered to entrust it to the porter. The sun shone with almost tropical brilliance through the dingy glass roof; the heat was intense.

"Wait a minute, wait a minute, Nellie," he implored.

"Cock-cock-cock-cock," came from the hamper explosively.

The platform of the popular holiday resort was crowded; just before Nellie and her daughter found a railway carriage, a venerable old Jew in front of them with a similar hamper of livestock heaved his burden slowly and laboriously into the guard's van. Every movement he made showed him to be diametrically opposed to being hustled. The vociferous cockerels in the hamper Mannie carried disturbed the chickens in the other old man's; they too set up a loud clucking and in reply the excited cockerels set up a tremendous hullabaloo. All was pandemonium, with the guard blowing his whistle as the old Jew boarded the train in a leisurely manner, his lumbering bent back impeding Nellie's harassed progress.

"Hurry along there, please," shouted the porter.

"No. Vat is de hurry?" expostulated the greybeard.

"Oh, dear, we'll never get in," breathed the frantic Nellie, who could have sent her co-religionist flying with a furious push.

But they were in, and the cockerels clucking their heads off with the chickens in the guard's van, one hamperful against the other, like a poultry farm gone mad.

"Goodbye, Mannie. You'll hear from me further," said Nellie out of the window as the train began to move. "Thank you for your hospitality." The gracious words had an uncompromising ring.

"Cock-cock-cock-cock."

"Chuck-chuck-chuck-chuck."

Red-faced and perspiring, Mannie ran alongside the train, his pink scalp glistening. "Vat a minute, vat a minute, Nellie. Ve won't part bad friends."

"Cock-cock-cock-cock."

"Chuck-chuck-chuck-chuck."

"A happy New Year, Nellie."

"Oh, pfui!" said Nellie with a snort.

She sank down in her corner seat and glared at her demure daughter beneath the brim of her bonnet with its bristling plumes.

"What are you giggling at, Miss, I should like to know?"

But presently, to the interest of the other occupants of the railway carriage, her fierce eyes began to twinkle and her grim mouth to expand into a smile. "Oh, that man. What a schlemiel," she told her daughter. "What a fool. His son steals one of my chicks so he thinks he'll square me with a couple of cockerels." She shook her head and wiped her eyes while her shoulders shook with laughter. "It would serve him right if I married him."

applesauce

one cup nutmeats or currants

one teaspoon cinnamon
one-half teaspoon cloves
one egg
one cup raisins

Sift sugar; beat butter until soft; add sugar gradually and blend ingredients until light and creamy. Beat in one egg. Sift flour and sprinkle lightly on combined raisins and nutmeats or currants. Sift remainder with baking soda, salt, cinnamon and cloves. Stir sifted ingredients gradually into butter mixture, until batter is smooth. LUNG AND LIVER BLINTZES

For the filling, broil together one-half pound beef liver and one-quarter of a beef lung. While this is broiling, cook two large onions, until lightly browned, with salt and pepper to taste, in one tablespoonful chicken fat, and then just enough water to cover. Put the broiled meat and onions through a meat chopper. For the dough, make a pancake batter of two cups of flour, a pinch of salt, and two eggs. Mix well, adding just enough water to make a thin batter, about one-half cup. Fry on one side only, in fat, and when each pancake is lightly browned on one side, place it, fried-side-up, on a towel. Place a spoonful of meat mixture in the centre of each pancake, and roll each one up. Bake in a greased pan, with a little fat on the top of each one, until golden-brown. This should yield about one dozen blintzes.

The president of the Finance District of Nuremberg to which the city of Bayreuth belongs has now declared in a statement issued to the press that he regrets the events in the synagogue in Bayreuth and that the officials concerned did not possess a judicial order for searching the synagogue but a private building in another street and that they confused the name of the street with that of the one in which the synagogue is situated. He added that he had taken steps to guard against such cases in the future, according to the World Jewish Congress.

Radioactive elements in the Hot Springs of Tiberias, Israel's spa on the Sea of Galilee, have been discovered, according to an announcement made by the Technion, the Israel Institute of Technology in Haifa. Tests have disclosed that the Springs contain a high concentration of the radioactive gas "radon." Research on the project has been carried on for the last two years under the direction of David B. Rosenblatt, American nuclear physicist, through a grant provided by the Fohs Foundation of Houston. The Tiberias Springs consist of seventeen natural hot springs, on the west shore of the Sea of Galilee, a short distance south of Tiberias. Remarkable curative properties have been ascribed to these springs since Roman times.

Is Liberal Judaism A "Religion Of Convenience"?

BY MONTAGUE ALFRED, IN THE LIBERAL JEWISH MONTHLY, OF LONDON, ENGLAND

The Jewish Religious Union was started by Miss Lily Montagu and Dr. Claude Montefiore in 1902 as the first concrete step towards the establishment of the Liberal Jewish Movement in England. Its aims were briefly: (a) to satisfy Jews who were intellectually and spiritually dissatisfied with the old form of Orthodoxy; (b) to make Services intelligible to the ordinary person; (c) to provide Services at times when economic circumstances allowed attendance.

By satisfying these aims it was hoped to reawaken the spirit of Judaism (and thereby of religion) in the minds of everyday Jews. In particular, it was hoped to attract back to Judaism that large body of Jews who had grown away from Orthodoxy and had become indifferent to Judaism because they could not accept Orthodox teaching and could find no spiritual satisfaction in Orthodox services.

The way in which Liberal Judaism hoped to do this was by giving them the opportunity to hear and understand what Liberal Judaism had to say on religion and on its relationship to modern thought, including that arising from scientific progress. But having gained their attention, what did Liberal Judaism have to say? This is the crux of the matter. Why had Orthodoxy lost its hold on so many Jews, and why did Liberal Judaism think it could gain back these Jews?

The essential factor in the answer is that Liberal Judaism believes in progressive revelation. It believes that God reveals himself continuously throughout time as man's capacity to understand is increased. It believes also that man is fallible; that although God cannot contradict himself, man's interpretations of His revelations may be contradictory. Orthodoxy, on the other hand, believes that God revealed himself once and for all on Mount Sinai where He gave to Moses both the Torah (i.e. the first five books of the Bible, or what is known as the "Written Law") and the "Oral Law" which was eventually written down and is contained in the Talmud.

Orthodoxy bases its practices and beliefs literally on the Bible and the Talmud, ignoring any developments that occurred later. Liberal Judaism, however, takes account of their later developments and, while still giving the Torah and the Talmud "the supreme place in its interpretation of Judaism" seeks to "sit, with all reverence, the pure from the impure in the laws which our ancestors formulated in order to satisfy the needs of their age."

This sifting and re-interpretation of past happenings, combined with the acceptance of new knowledge as it is revealed to man (such as the Darwinian theory of evolution), has resulted in some Liberal Jewish practices differing from Orthodox ones. This is natural and, indeed, inevitable, as ceremonial and practice, if they are to have any meaning, must reflect the thoughts of those partaking in them. Some of these different practices are known to all — in a Liberal Synagogue men and women may sit together; fasting on Yom Kippur is left to the individual to decide according to whether it helps or retards his ability to "atone"; and riding or working on the Sabbath is not regarded out of hand as being irreligious.

These practical divergences between Liberalism and Orthodoxy may, however, in my view, constitute a threat to Liberal Judaism, and we must ensure that Liberal Judaism does not become known and sought after only for its outward ceremonial, and not for its spiritual significance. We are all familiar with the taunt that Liberal Judaism is a "religion of convenience," and, although it required courage to join the Liberal Jewish Synagogue in its first years, this is no longer the case, and the taunt cannot to-day be dismissed lightly.

How many people in your congregation or in mine have joined because it is convenient? How many appreciate the true difference between Liberalism and Orthodoxy? Perhaps the figures will speak for themselves. In my own congregation, the membership has increased sevenfold since its foundation. But what of the active membership? How many people attend the services, and how many attend the annual meeting and the discussion group meetings? I should be very surprised if the number has doubled!

Liberal Judaism was started largely because Jews were growing indifferent to their religion. Can we say to-day that the bulk of Liberal Jews (or perhaps I should say members of Liberal Jewish Congregations) are any less indifferent than their "Orthodox" friends?

If a non-Jew wishes to become Jewish, we make him pass a fairly severe test, not of extensive learning, but of character and sincerity. Should we perhaps apply different, but equally severe, tests to Jews wishing to become members of a Liberal Jewish congregation?

I realize that this would result in reduced membership and would raise considerable problems, not least of which would be financial. But is our present increase in membership really establishing an effective adherence to Judaism in a large enough proportion of our new members?

In considering these problems, it is perhaps worth while recording that intending members of the Society of Friends have to satisfy quite severe tests of character and sincerity, that non-active members usually cease to be counted as members, that the number of Friends (or Quakers) has declined considerably since their early days, but that their moral influence has probably never been as high as it is to-day.

However, the position of the Jews is unique, and what has served another religious body may have no significance for us. The complete answer to the question posed in the title of this article is neither easy nor straightforward, but I can quite sure that it is deserving of much thought, and that more emphasis should be given to the "effective adherence" to Judaism than to the mere increase in numbers.

is engaged in a critical struggle for their allegiance.

The tragedy is that "although our great nation was the inspiring champion of a genocide convention, the incredible paradox remains that three years after successfully pressing for this international treaty on the prevention and punishment of such a flood of barbarism as that which inundated Europe and took six million Jewish lives, the United States Senate still withholds ratification," he said. Moreover, at a time "when mankind is once more bombarded by the cultivated Machiavellianism of totalitarian propaganda, the pressure of powerful groups who mistakenly fear a non-existent danger of a United Nations convention nullifying the federal Constitution, denies to us our historical championship of international morality."

"The Jews of Warsaw knew that their struggle was doomed," Dr. Goldstein said, "but they also knew their would become the symbol of humanity's everlasting struggle against the anti-humanists for a better world in which the blood-stained record of the Nazi genocidal battalions would remain an evil memory."

"By their act, they gave a new and proud meaning to the word 'physis' which they transformed from a symbol of humble meekness and submission to one of dignity and active resistance. The rubble of the razed ghettos symbolized a triumph of the spirit which will inspire generations to come to fight for the right to life and liberty wherever it is threatened and whatever may be the outcome."

Since the beginning of this century, the United States has consistently fought mass violence abroad and has persisted in its efforts to help victims of massacres, pogroms and organized barbarity. Dr. Goldstein pointed out, "President Theodore Roosevelt rebuked the Rumanian Government because of religious massacres and instructed his Secretary of State to declare that 'this country cannot be a silent party to an international wrong.' President Taft denounced a trade agreement with the Czar because of pogroms. President Wilson instructed his Ambassador to Turkey to intervene on behalf of the Armenians. President Franklin D. Roosevelt fought the Nazi 'Operation Murder', and made freedom from fear one of his four basic freedoms. After this war the Government of the United States gave leadership to all allies in fighting genocide through the Nuremberg trials."

"The great name which America has made for herself as an example for those who seek truth and justice, as a nation which champions the weak and oppressed for the sake of humanity, is today belittled by a pettifogging opposition to the document which embodies those great aims in international law," Dr. Goldstein declared. "The American people," he said, "must call on their Senate to ratify the Genocide Convention. They must demand that the organizations which were created to uphold the ideals of the American Revolution and Constitution re-examine our history and realize that America has stood highest in the hearts of men everywhere when she was true to her democratic conscience and moral ideas as the champion of human life and liberty."

prices are not to be found except on the black market. This is currently the case with automobile batteries, which can be bought on the black market—for $100 ($100 or $140, depending on which exchange rate is used).

The most notable rises in official food prices since February 13 have been for frozen meat, 46 per cent; fish fillet, 41 per cent; coffee, 37 per cent, and tea, 32 per cent — all imported items.

Some further increases and inflationary pressure, it is feared, may result from the new agreement on cost-of-living allowances just concluded between the trade unions and the manufacturers' association which will swell the total payrolls $2,000,000 or $3,000,000, says the New York Times.

Steel and 80 per cent of General Motors."

In the year beginning in September, the new company hopes to make 100,000 to 120,000 tires and tubes. Another plant, owned by the General Tire Company, will go into production in the autumn at Petah Tikva, just outside Tel Aviv, and will produce about the same number of tires. Both companies will concentrate on tires for buses and trucks and will export about 60 per cent of their output.

Apart from the tie-up with Histadrut, Alliance has two other features that may provide precedent for other industrial enterprises. First, according to Mr. Taubman, it has arranged for a fund in New York that can be used as a safeguard against delays in the allocation of foreign exchange by the Israeli Government. The fund will advance foreign exchange pending Israeli allocations. Second, it has arranged with rubber brokers to establish a pool of rubber in bonded warehouses in Israel. Alliance—and other companies — will be able to get a steady flow from this warehouse, reports the New York Times.
